DUAL JOB WRECKS JAPANESE PREMIER

Takahashi Answers as Leader and Finance Minister in Cabinet Crash.

PREMIER TAKAHASHI.

By The Associated Press.

TOKIO, June 6.—The resignation of Premier Takahashi's cabinet, though it came suddenly, was not the result of any sudden change in affairs. It developed after word of the fall of the ministry had been circulated. The cabinet at a meeting last night, the last of several in recent days, decided on the step, and it was announced this morning.

Students of Japanese politics professed to see in the occurrence a confusion in the public mind of Takahashi, the premier, with Takahashi in his other capacity of leader of the Seiyukai, now the majority party in the diet. Displeasure caused by the actions of the party, it was intimated, had been visited on the head of its leader in his other capacity as prime minister.

There is evidence of this, observers aver, in the rapidity with which the fall of the cabinet followed the decision of the Seiyukai to support Takahashi and give him authority to oust ministers with whom he disagreed. This development, which aligned the party solidly behind the cabinet, preceded the fall of the latter by only one day.

Cabinet Named by Hara.

Takahashi's cabinet, it was recalled today, was his in name only. It being, in fact, that named by the late Premier Hara, taken over by Takahashi when Hara was assassinated. To this, in part, was attributed Takahashi's inability to get it functioning as a unit.

Takahashi, as minister of finance as well as premier, was unable to find the funds to fulfill the somewhat expensive promises made by his minister of education, though he was personally in sympathy with an extension of higher educational facilities, and the result was a falling away in popular support. Then Takahashi could not muster the force to still the militarists' clamor and effect a reduction of land armaments. He also evoked powerful opposition from the land owners and other wealthy class when he sought to extend the suffrage.

Thus far there has been little intimation that Japan's financial situation, which now is depressed, has anything to do with the resignation. But as much as a month ago the government frankly was confessing its inability to get funds out of the banks and into the hands of commercial enterprises. Whether there has been pressure on the part of commercial and financial interests to bring about the resignation, so that a new government may try its hand at measures for revitalizing Japanese trade, now sadly hampered by inability to give long-term credits, remains to be seen.

Criticism of Militarists.

An interesting sidelight on the affair is the effect of criticism of the retiring premier made of the military interests when he was finance minister in the Hara cabinet. At that time he expressed his opposition to the interference of the militarists in diplomatic matters. How much support this cost him later in his efforts to have the army reduced is problematical, but certainly it cost him something.

Takahashi made several efforts to ease the burden of the prime ministry before that which relieved him of it entirely. On May 2 he requested the resignations of his ministers on the plea of re-organization. After four days crowded with executive conferences he withdrew the request, pending disposition of several pending items of business. June 2 he renewed the request on the ground of divergencies of views among the ministers. He was urged to retain office until the agreements framed at the Washington arms conference had been put into effect, and the Seiyukai voted him its confidence, as cited, but last night's long meeting wound up with the decision for a general resignation.

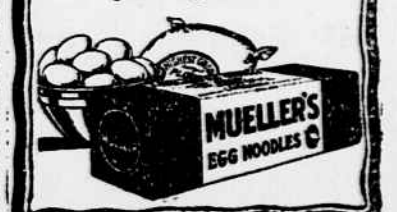

So far Gov. Gen. Saito, head of the government in Korea, is the man most prominently mentioned for the leadership of the new cabinet.

The Roman women treated their hair very fancifully, curling it and sprinkling it with gold dust.
